Not illustrated. 1917 Excerpt: ...degree the dropping out process and the approach to affective neutrality, running parallel with the increased accuracy and speed of recognition. But not only so; all show a change in one definite direction. As the images and feelings drop out, recognition, for all the observers, tends toward the one type in which the perception of the letter calls up its name and nothing else is present in consciousness. This report is made much oftener than any other, and much oftener in the second half of any series than in the first half. Moreover, toward the last of the series even this disappears and the touching of the letter sets off the reaction without even the appearance of the name. More and more frequently occur such reports as the following: The name and the pressing of the key occurred at the same time. The name came to consciousness after the reaction. I touched the letter and reacted automatically. What, if anything, does this show? Not that all recognition passes through a stage in which it is mediated by a mere name, nor that all recognition becomes a motor reaction; but that given the present Aufgabe, recognition for the various observers tends to approximate this one type through practice. I should say Aufgaben for there are two--one implicit and one explicit. The normal reaction to a word or letter is to pronounce it. We may be said to act under a more or less permanent Aufgabe to read what is written. It may easily be supposed that some other form of experiment would call out a different type of reaction. But in addition to this natural reaction, the experiment requires the formation of a closer and closer association between the felt letter and another kind of reaction--the pressing of the key. The indications are that if the experiment had been carri...
